Fitness advocates call for height restrictions to be dropped on Melbourne's Metropolitan Ring Road (MTR) in a bid to open the way for taller building. An online petition signed by more than 9,000 people has also been launched to stop work on the $1.9 billion tollway. The Metro Tunnel Authority, which is building the road, says it is already the biggest in the world, making height restrictions obsolete. But some are calling for the height limit to be dropped in the interest of improving the quality of life in the north-eastern Melbourne suburbs. Height and density restrictions on towers are common throughout Melbourne, but the MTR has a unique clause in its design guidelines that says towers must be no higher than 80 metres. The rules were put in place to avoid overshadowing the Yarra River by drawing attention to the beauty of the river, and have been in place since the MTR was first built, in the 1980s. But now some want that restriction to be removed to encourage the development of more apartment blocks and towers in the north-east. 'We're happy with the way it is', says one resident. (ABC News) "I think they should let them build as high as they can. I want more skyline, bigger buildings and more apartments," one resident told the ABC. "They're beautiful buildings as it is, I don't think the skyline would look great if there weren't any above that building height," she said. "At the moment it's very car-centric, you get caught in traffic jams and it's not really a very nice area," she said. A third of homes destroyed in winter storms Other residents said they were looking forward to the taller buildings, but were worried about how safe it would be. "Safety-wise, it would definitely be taller, but I wouldn't want to live in a taller building," one said. The MTR Tollway Authority says height restrictions are necessary to shield the Yarra River from views. (Supplied: MTR) Some residents, however, say they are happy with the way the MTR is set up and don't want anything to change. But Green Urbanist, an organisation that is campaigning for sustainable communities, said if anything, they would like to see more skyscrapers built. "I think they should be able to go as high as they want
