Mercedes were found to be using an illegal fuel rig in the 2014 F1 season. As a result, they were banned from collecting race fuel tokens and face a potential 80-point penalty from the stewards. In the current season, the FIA has not come down hard on Mercedes, as the team were not found to have committed any 'technical offences'. However, Mercedes have yet to be able to complete a full course of tests for the new V6 turbo-hybrid regulations that have come into place for 2015. Renault have tested for three days and Mercedes two, having made their debut with a half-day run at the beginning of December. On the subject of fuel rigs, Lauda told Motorsport.com: "I think it's a bad choice from the FIA to sanction the team. "If you want to accept that the fuel rig is not a problem, then you should allow the team to work more. But with the [fuel] rig, the FIA lost any advantage they could have had." Lauda also criticised the timing of the ban, which followed a week of testing. "It was the last week in December, so why did it come only now? For example, if they had discovered in August, say, maybe we
