The packet processing characteristics of a network device, such as a packet processor, may cause information regarding the application being run by the packet processor to be sent to the packet processor for processing instead of being sent to the network interface. This information may include results of a computation, such as a hash, that determines the data included in packets for a specific application. This computation may be computed with every packet, which may consume considerable processing cycles and resources. Before the computation is performed, a packet processor may determine whether the computation should be performed. This may be referred to as a computation trigger. For example, a packet processor may determine whether to compute the computation described above with every packet received from a network interface or perform this computation upon a specific packet. In some cases, the determination of whether to perform the
