full size. A new risk-factor score for predicting coronary artery disease: a multivariate analysis of the Framingham population. The value of risk factor data obtained prior to the onset of clinical disease for predicting the presence of severe coronary artery disease

(CAD) is examined. A prospective cohort study of 15,036 Framingham Heart Study participants (average age at first exam 50 years) was used to develop logistic regression models of the probability of CAD for (1) risk factors identified at the initial exam (e.g.,

---

hypertension, smoking,
diabetes, serum cholesterol),
(2) risk factors identified at the second exam (e.g.,
hypertension, smoking,
diabetes, serum cholesterol, physical activity), and (3) a new risk score consisting of

the sum of a three-factor scale developed using the second data set (e.g., hypertension, smoking, diabetes, physical activity) and the serum cholesterol measured at the second exam. The predictive value of the new score was compared with its value for the first three risk factor models. The area under the receiver operating characteristic (ROC) curve was 0.74. The mean predicted probability of CAD was 2.2%, rising to 18.8% among individuals with a predicted probability of CAD of 40% or higher. Thus, 7.4% of the Framingham cohort had a predicted probability of CAD of 40% or higher. A new three-factor risk score for predicting severe CAD was developed based on follow-up data for 15,036 participants in the Framingham Heart Study cohort. The predicted probability of CAD rose with the risk score, increasing from 2.2% among individuals at lowest risk to 18.8% among those at highest risk.

---
