U concentrations in surface sediments from the mouth of a highly polluted river located in a coastal area in the Brazilian Northeast were investigated. Significant differences in U concentration were observed between sites in the strongly and weakly contaminated areas of the river mouth. The U concentration was significantly lower in the samples from river deposits than in the coastal ones, which suggests that U loss had occurred along the river. As the contaminated river deposited material along its course, gradually increasing the U concentration, and a high affinity of U for inorganic and/or 1cb139a0ed
