Tune in to cable and satellite network channels — NBC, Comedy Central, The Disney Channel, and others — and you will find only one programming emphasis: NBA Basketball. There's only one topic that seems to have any air time in almost every show, in every episode: Tim Duncan, Antonio McDyess, and the Big 3. It's more than time that we take a hard look at the underlying culture that makes it so easy to pretend that this is acceptable. Yes, the Big 3 itself epitomizes everything that is great about the NBA. Tim Duncan was the last stop on a 12-year championship winning ladder. Antonio McDyess held the ball away from Chris Bosh for the entire fourth quarter before Bosh scored in Game 7 of the NBA Finals. Duncan and McDyess were the inspiration for Steve Nash, with a year to go before they play their final games. My love for the NBA is only rivaled by my love for the men and women who play it. When you hear the stories of the Big 3's honors, you would expect to be reminded of an NBA season that is over now. That may be true, but we are in the middle of a new basketball season. The Miami Heat are back from a seemingly endless number of injuries, with LeBron James returning for the first time since the season prior. The San Antonio Spurs are trying to win their third title. The Chicago Bulls and Indiana Pacers are still in the mix.
