The predominant view of the evolution of animal morphology has been that heterochrony has been of little importance. An alternative explanation-particularly appealing for shape-heterochrony theory-is that phenotypic divergence has resulted from the action of different selection regimes: female choice in the case of choosy males, and natural selection in the case of attractive, but unattractive, males. Sexual selection theory predicts that this should lead to changes in male morphology in different ways. When sexual selection is weak, as in most deep-sea sharks, divergence in male morphology should be small, and a positive correlation
