Architecture is a process-based tool, which means that it requires a certain amount of manual intervention. It allows for components to be designed, assembled and developed. It was included in AutoCAD LT. In AutoCAD Architecture, there are various components available. Component types include walls, windows, doors, roof components, etc. These components can be assembled together. The interface is similar to the model-based interface, with the components highlighted in a context. When components are selected, the components themselves are shown, and can be dragged, moved and rotated. Other functions include wall-to-floor gradations, door and window installation, 2D floor plan or building section drawing, and elevation. There is a search option available within AutoCAD Architecture. This search can locate a wall, door, window, roof, stair or other components. It is similar to the Searchbar in other programs. It is also possible to search based on external criteria (i.e. that has a roof, has a door or is part of a project). AutoCAD Architecture's component library has a wide range of options available.
