1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to hydroelectric power and, more specifically, to a method and apparatus for ensuring the reliability of a hydroelectric power generation system. 2. Description of the Prior Art Hydroelectric power generation systems have been used for many years. Conventional hydroelectric power generation systems include a power generator that is driven by the force of a passing body of water which is regulated, typically by the force of a turbine driven by the passing water, so as to control the speed at which the passing water is directed over the turbine and to thereby control the speed of the generator. Such conventional hydroelectric power generation systems have the disadvantage that the force of the passing water, and thus the power of the generated electrical energy, is regulated to a fixed level during the generation of the power. The disadvantage of such fixed level hydroelectric power generation

What's new:

A great influence on the development of Seren's gameplay is the tabletop role-playing game known as Pathfinder. Since this system was the basis for the story of Path of the Exile, it influences a lot the feel of the game. Speaking from a personal point of view: dungeon crawling and exploring have always been a major part of my gameplay and the game of Seren greatly influenced the exploration style. That said, the graphic direction also had a major impact, and in combination the gameplay and style grew into one of my favorites. Here are just some of my favorite parts of the game to show you the development process. Seren's evolution as a top-down shooter took time but inevitable from the start. After Matt Martinez (who was a MMD player since Reaper of Souls) joined, we started adapting to the look and feel of action games. Path of Exile certainly started a trend of high-resolution texture where detail was crucial and design didn't have a smooth path. Seren's early design is made of a concept of action game with high level of details with a more abstract look. The second concept merged itself with the later Diablo II look and the artwork. The first draft of the HUD (as it was known then) from the cinematic trailer showed the adorable fusion between the game's personalities and sassy dialogue. In the cinematic trailer, there's a video that explains to us "here's what to do, konami". A deeper concept was necessary and the system was conceived. In the end the characters of the game are boys (none of the characters though!). The first draft consisted of a system of communication between the player and Seren, suggesting what decisions you are going to make and the game is going to speak to you. In fact, some videos were made with the characters in front of a strange background and they were doing different stuff to read what was the most appropriate decision for the character. The three main characters from the early design even shared unique dialogue conversations to gradually establish the relationships with the player. In the end, it just couldn't work. It is difficult to make a boy speak and behave like his dream girl. A girl was chosen, for the sake of consistency, but that choice wasn't without consequence. Seren felt too feminine to express the spirit and thought of the characters, and the sense of presence of the player in an otaku-like game. A day
