It's all about productivity, usability, and user satisfaction for the web in general, not just about the web but a larger focus on the computing world. Rapidly changing equipment: the technological options available to a hospital pharmacy. In the past several years, different components of hospital drug formulary and logistics systems have been undergoing rapid change. A hospital pharmacist must develop a working understanding of current formulary systems, the operating characteristics of unit dose medication dispensing equipment and the capabilities of pharmacy information systems. To increase the number of drugs available in automated form, in-hospital pharmacies are replacing out-patient pharmacies, and out-patient pharmacies are beginning to replace mail-order pharmacies. In-hospital drug distribution systems are altering the way that hospitals purchase drugs, which provides an opportunity for pharmacists to influence planning and purchasing decisions. Hospitals have implemented computerized prescribing systems, computer-based medication administration systems and computer-generated patient care (eg, physician order entry, laboratory monitoring, etc) record systems. Pharmacists must learn how to work within these new systems, and must familiarize themselves with the new interfaces available. An improved understanding of the components of automated medication distribution systems and the different types of software used to administer and manage these systems will allow pharmacists to take advantage of changing methods of medication distribution. I like
