Herpes simplex virus (HSV) utilizes its ORF 20 (hcr) gene products to antagonize signal transduction pathways to facilitate productive infection. We have identified a novel viral protein tyrosine phosphatase (vHcr20) encoded by the hcr gene that was activated during productive HSV infection. The putative catalytic domain of the vHcr20 protein was highly similar to protein tyrosine phosphatase in a range of different organisms. Transient expression studies in HeLa cells demonstrated that the transient expression of vHcr20 markedly inhibited TNF-alpha-induced tyrosine phosphorylation of cellular proteins. Stable expression of vHcr20 in the presence of a tyrosine kinase-specific inhibitor, 2'-amino-3'-methoxyflavone, also resulted in the inhibition of tyrosine phosphorylation of cellular proteins. Direct binding assays revealed that vHcr20 bound to the class I phosphatase SHP-1. Altogether, these results show that vHcr20 functions as a novel phosphatase that interferes with host signal transduction pathways and suggest that vHcr20 is involved in HSV-mediated cell survival.[The pulmonary hypertension of the aged and of chronic obstructive lung disease.
