This has been studied in the area of mood and cognition disorders. One of these disorders is Post Traumatic Stress Disorder (PTSD). PTSD is a disorder occurring in combat veterans, where it results in a relentless reliving of the trauma. A well-recognized feature of PTSD is the hyperarousal state; as a result excessive hypercortisolism occurs in the patient. Activation of GCRs using the agonist dexamethasone has been shown to reduce the hyperarousal symptom of PTSD, and reduce the associated hypercortisolism. This mechanism may be applicable to other anxiety disorders. Stimulation of GCRs in other regions of the brain may have other beneficial effects, such as generalized anxiety, and panic disorder. Another illness to benefit from GCRs is alcohol use disorder, which is a chronic disorder, with an acute effect where the alcohol causes sedation, and then a more chronic sedative effect once the brain adapts to this new state. The chronic effects of alcohol use disorder can include cognitive impairment, a difficulty initiating activity, executive control deficit, and lowered mood. The best treatment for alcohol use disorder would be one that would simultaneously treat both the acute and chronic effects. Activation of GCRs in the orbitofrontal cortex (OFC) might be expected to be of value in treating alcohol use disorder, since this area has been found to be a critical area of dysfunction in alcoholism.
