Slipstream is an arcade racing game, made in memory of the late 80s and early 90s period of time, and the memories and music that I have of that time. In Slipstream, you control a special, powerful, and very unusual race car. You're tasked with completing a series of exotic races, all of which provide you with a different type of challenge. Along the way, you can drive by the side of the road, ditch the raceway, battle with traffic or avoid it altogether, which leads to countless race scenarios, in which you either win, lose, or tie with your rivals. There's a variety of game modes in Slipstream, including a free-roaming Grand Tour mode, a single race mode, Time Trial, and an elimination mode. There are 20 tracks to complete, set in locations all over the world, with the shortest one taking place in New York City. The game itself is fully local multiplayer-enabled, and you can connect with up to 4 other players via Bluetooth or LAN. The game's soundtrack is composed of an eclectic and eclectic mix of music: from 80s synthpop and jazz fusion to straight-up 80s electro, the soundtrack is a real melting pot of sounds. The game is played with a controller on a console or a keyboard and mouse on a PC, and is fully configurable and customizable in regards to the music or no music at all. What's new:

Originally posted by Spex It appears you are not well informed about the natural environment or the biotic components of it as it is those elements which most consistently hold biomass. Two other issues are the fluctuations of the natural environment and the wind. Just I will let them continue their arguments with no concern for any future implication of the worst case, in my eyes. The only concern I have is, how long until they start killing each other for saying this kind of thing. It's like they're all still stuck in "objective" science. Originally posted by Kestrel

Actually, if that statement is true, then maybe the increased amount of forest should be a positive, not a negative. I'm pretty sure the effect of increased forest on biomass on a global level is positive. We don't have so much forest on the planet anymore that it would have a negative effect. If you took a world with reduced forests and replaced them with new forests, all biomass would increase, in all forests, everywhere. But, that effect is not well defined because it's only important on a regional scale. If over the entire planet you plant more trees you will have a larger increase in biomass, just because of more biomass overall. But, if you plant them in some areas, you would probably see less of an increase. For example, if you plant new trees in the desert, they won't store large amounts of biomass, but they might in rainforests on the equator.

Originally posted by Kestrel If, which I have no idea if it is or not, that increased feeding on the natural ecosystem causes biomass increase. If it does, that is a positive it does. But, most nature scientists don't think that way. You need to look at the organization of life, which is based on three factors: 1) The life of the forest. 2) The life of the individual. 3) The death of the individual. The three factors are the parts that form the whole and the overall fundamental level of life. Each of these parts is made up of a whole of structures and mechanisms in order to reproduce and continue life. The feeding relations are to survive, to reproduce and to continue life in the next generation. The relation to the environment is mostly first maintaining the resource. For many forms of life it is also possible to drive away competition, that is survival in the next generation. Competition
