AI partners will make their decision on which way to run based on the situation and whether to attack or defend. "We are using the most advanced motion capture technology to give both our AI and player counterparts greater decision-making options and more flexibility," said Andrew Leo, director of game development at EA. "It will enable a more responsive and more varied football experience with a much wider range of player movement and positioning than before." Alongside the signature ball control and perfect head movement, players can look to target bodyweight transfers, incredible dribbling and added sprint speed to offloaded speed. The new match engine implements a new player-centric AI, "Potion Vision" that constantly reassesses its best way to play a specific situation and what is most important to the player. FIFA 17's Ronaldo added movement to create more action (Credit: EA Sports) Even more responsive animations are available to players in key moments, making tackles and passing feel more impactful. Add-on content allows players to further affect their gameplay in many ways. The monthly Pass Companion lets players experience the game through the eyes of a defensive passer. Offering more gameplay options for passing, goalkeepers can now use low- and high-speed passes with speed and distance added for long distance passes. FIFA 17's Cristiano Ronaldo added movement to his game (Credit: EA Sports) Moving on to on-ball tactics, increased sprint speed, ball control and extra speed and sprint ability give players the ability to create space and position themselves for shots on goal. Players are also equipped with the ability to intercept a pass and take a shot as well as tackles in over-hit situations, with a wider range of tackle animations for more options. FIFA 17's Luka Modric added movement to his game (Credit: EA Sports) Next, head-to-head play on the pitch takes a whole new direction with a higher level of accuracy and traction. Stronger player collisions and speed will trigger the new AI-controlled system to determine possession of the ball. Once the ball is passed, new player movement controls and speed with AI opponents will dictate who can get into the scoring zone. Realistically
