is used only in the United States. It was only first used in 1796, during the first administration of George Washington. It was used for the first time by George Washington to veto a bill, and over time the Veto Act became a part of the legislative branch.[2] The procedure to a Veto was outlined in Article I, Section 7 of the United States Constitution: “Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by Yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten Days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a

Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return, in which Case it shall not be a Law.”

Presidential Veto. A presidential veto may be exercised in a variety of ways, including either a total or partial veto. When exercised, a veto message is delivered to the House of Representatives and Senate; two-thirds of both houses must then disapprove the vetoed law for it to become law. For example, if the President vetoes an appropriation bill but the Senate does not override the veto, the legislation is returned to the President as “vetoed” and remains law without the President's signature. The other
