Read more: "Children's media" is a general term describing various forms of media, especially mass media, geared towards young people or children. It has been used by psychologists and educators to describe children's fiction and non-fiction media such as television, books, music, newspapers, comic books, and video games. Their impact on children's well-being and education have been of interest to the media industry. In recent decades, the term is a catch-all for media content that is often stereotyped and is considered to be of lesser quality, value or importance than that placed on media content directed at adults. The number of hours children spend in front of a screen has been said to be the primary reason for the rise in the cases of attention deficit

A comic artist is an artist who creates comic illustrations in comic books and comic strips (where each page of a comic is individually drawn). As with other forms of artistic media, the origin of the term has been contested. Many believe the word "comic" derives from the French word "comique", meaning "of the people", because early comic strips were usually drawn by and for the people, who published them in their own local newspapers and magazines. Words and pictures are combined to make a comic strip or cartoon. The illustrator draws a picture, usually sequential, and the artist draws the text as captions below or next to the illustrations. Every element of the comic book or magazine is based on words and pictures and is an integral part of the joke, not merely there to decorate the page. Early comic strips were popular in American newspapers from the late 19th century and the 20th century. Artists who developed the new art form included Winsor McCay, George Herriman, Harold Gray, Chester Gould, Robert Ripley, Charles H. Schulz, Walt Kelly, Vaughn Bodē
