Full Version Gameplay : ===== Boulth Reminds me of The Sims. The game is played from the perspective of "husband". There's no Kdas here, just funds. You can take a nap in your office and while you're asleep earn money, which you can spend on gadgets, furniture and children. There's also a small lottery - you can bet your funds that you will lose at least some of your pool to the roulette wheel, but you can also win big if you gamble semi-successfully. If you end up with 0 your money will be stolen and that husband gets his wife instead. The wife is usually employed by her husband - but if you like to spend too much money, you might end up with a wife that works full time and earns money too. ~~~ kbaszcyk > There's no Kdas here, just funds. To that end, we keep coming up with all sorts of crazy programs that teach kids how to code. SpaceX has taken that to new, awesome heights with their used rocket PROTOX crate, which is basically a glorified bouncy castle designed to impart scientific knowledge to kids via the medium of soft stuffing and bouncing. Old science fair project inspiration While we doubt the crate was ever intended to be launched into space, we're sure it was great for elementary school science fairs and such. We've always disliked the science fairs. Shame on us, but we can't help it. Those competitions are just awful. The tutorial we've linked to is simple and doesn't involve rocket science, but it's well-written, has a handful of well-chosen, easily-digestible examples, and was written by someone who actually believes in science.
