They have made the game a little more involved with more than the original formula. franco, I agree with all your ideas. i have built a lot of the "idea" around the original formula. but they seem to have a good idea at the moment as in what they are doing. as i have seen one preview of the maps i am going to be playing. i agree with most of the ideas. but i would be loosing many ideas. but it's up to them how they are going to execute it. That would be nice if we could contact you and you would keep an eye on the outcome. :) Hello nell,I do have a concept that would work. I would like to present to you my idea but i need you to give me your thoughts on the concept. I like the idea of having a few people that participate on the forum helping out with the game. But i have a few ideas I would like to discuss with you. My ideas: Idea 1: Every game can be played as solo. At certain points in the game you get an invite from a friend. They give you a invite code or link. You enter the game and begin as solo. You get started by collecting a series of "starter packs". There would be a list of starter packs that players could spend on. they would provide things like weapons, items etc. If they have a good battle they would receive more starter packs to purchase and earn. If you get captured and lose a match you get a starter pack. You can invite as many friends as you want to come play with you. I think this would be fun. For a few that participate. I think it would be a fun game but it also encourages a few players to participate in the game. The disadvantage would be there would be no more than 6 people playing. Idea 2: Free to play. You can play the game for free as a trial. You can continue to play for free for as long as you want. Then if you want to continue to play you have to pay a small fee. The "starter packs" that players receive from solo games, could be considered as some kind of free trial. I think this would be a fun game. Idea 3: You can play

A 19-year-old woman stepped up to the podium and took the microphone. She spoke passionately about the need for stronger gun control laws. She spoke calmly and poised, in a perfectly logical way, that anyone would understand. After all, it was for practical purposes that she had been invited here. As a freshman in college, she is running for the City Council, and she needs local votes. The Democrats would have her talk for about an hour, but her slot was cut short. She was so persuasive, however, that she impressed members of local Democratic Party leadership and helped land her the invitation to speak at Big Brothers and Sisters of the Twin Towers (BBBT). Sponsored by and for the area's prominent Democrats, the event is being held this week in the city of Port Jefferson, N.Y., about 5 miles north of Westchester County. The woman's name is Nanette Wilson. She was brought up as a Republican. Once she got to college, she started reading books like "The Violent Century" by Sidney Tarrow and "The Politics of Gun Control," by Jack Lewis, who teaches history at NYU. She felt compelled to learn about political issues, and gun control was one of them. She said she found her way onto the subject by way of Arlo Guthrie's "Alice's Restaurant," which featured a passage on Jimmy Carter's ban on the sale of guns to civilians. Wilson said that the song "fed my consciousness" at a critical time. She recalled the day when she heard the news that President Reagan had been shot: "I was still in my room—I guess I was in bed—when I heard this dispatch about this National Guard soldier going into the White House and shooting the President. I assumed that the President would be dead in the hospital, of course, because there's no more room in the White House. I looked at my parents, and they were down in the living room, holding hands. I felt scared, and I asked them what happened. They looked at each other and shrugged." She doesn't blame the gun owner for Reagan's death. But she said she decided then to devote her life to campaigning for gun control. She studied George Orwell's novel "Animal Farm," which was prescient in its focus on the dehumanizing aspects of big government. "I agreed with the book, but it didn't entirely prepare me for what I was going to walk into," she said. That is
