Stocksynd House is a listed landmark building in the South Side of Sheffield, England. It is one of the most significant buildings in Sheffield's Chinese character quarter. The stucco mansion was built in 1864–65 by the Chinese silk merchant, Lin Fung, for the Reverend Alexander Hart, who had arrived in Sheffield in the early 1850s to set up his mission there. Hart bought the site of the house in 1859; the architect was Thomas Sheasby, of Sheffield; the cost was £20,000. Designed by Sheasby as a circular, multi-storey building with a dome, the house is built of flint and Bath Stone, to replicate the Ancient Temples built by Chinese emperors, which Lin used as a model. It has East Asian decorative features, with pagodas to the side of each level, and an entrance hall surrounded by columns. The grounds include views over the city that are made more impressive by the trees planted there. It is a Grade II* Listed building and is the first purpose-built dwelling of Sheffield's Chinese community. It is described as the prototype for the Chinese community of later years. The word "Stocksynd" is believed to be derived from "Sheffield", as it was the original location of the Sheffield Chinese Silk Factory. The interior is described as "elegant and orientalised" with "wealthy and overwrought" decorative features carried out by Sheffield's "most respected firm of interior decorators" for British middle-class tastes. It has 30 rooms. Literature In the novel The Chinese Sorcerer by Warrington E. Mason, Lin Fung, and his brother Ngan have just arrived in Sheffield in 1859 and try to establish a silk factory in Stocksynd House; they find the capital required, but not the labour force. McGovern (1990) made a brief reference to the building in History of Stocksynd House and the evolution of the Chinese Community in Sheffield, without giving any further details. McGovern said that some of the finest examples of Chinese architecture in the world may be found in Sheffield in the 'seventies' of the 19th century, and that Stocksynd House was one of those valuable buildings. The stucco mansion was built in 1864–65 for the Chinese silk merchant, Lin Fung, who arrived in Sheffield in the early 1850s. The
