For the last couple of days we have seen a lot of questions on the hot network questions list, all of which are fairly well received. It's been flagged as possibly a coordinated "mini tour" for the site, but it seems at least one site did something similar: No matter the answer, if it's not on my monitor I have yet to attempt it. Is this the sole purpose of this hot network question block, or has something changed? A: I believe the questions were re-staged for the network by a moderator. The fact that there were questions on the list for several consecutive days before the re-staging indicates this. It looks as though this was because of a moderator's decision to close all the questions by July 1st as they were "not about computer hardware or software but about mathematics, statistics, or data analysis." If this was a "mini tour" for the site, then it was certainly not well done. A: I think this is all the result of a long, but rather private conversation that was prompted by the moderator team and resulted in a lot of back and forth. For reasons that seem rather unclear to the public, a moderator decided to close all questions older than four days for good. The reason for this was that those questions could not even have started to be answered by July 1st. That was pretty much the only constraint for this. I fear that a lot of people have learnt all the answers in those questions, and are now somewhat looking for a self-help-book or a how-to-in-a-nutshell kind of answer. It does not help that the currently displayed questions are not the questions that provoked all the back and forth between the moderator and the Stack Exchange team. All I can offer is that if anyone has learned something from those old questions, then I'm very sorry that you had to suffer through them, but I don't know if that is the case. However, what does help is that you can now see the question you had been moaning about,
