Antioxidant activity of naringenin. The antioxidant effect of naringenin, a simple flavanone found in citrus fruits, was investigated by means of the luminol-dependent chemiluminescence (CL) method. Naringenin inhibited CL generation in a concentration-dependent manner in both hydrophilic and lipophilic rat liver microsomes. The inhibition of CL generation by naringenin was more pronounced in the presence of EDTA than in its absence. Naringenin also inhibited CL generation in rat liver microsomes activated by either Fe(2+)/ascorbate or dicumarol/ADP/Fe(2+). Thus, naringenin was found to inhibit CL formation in a direct and indirect fashion via reducing compounds with peroxidase or metal-catalyzed reactions. The reduction of Fe(3+) to Fe(2+) by ascorbate and other reducing compounds was also inhibited by naringenin. Naringenin-induced inhibition of CL generation was detected only in microsomes of liver, lung and kidney of rats, indicating that naringenin also acts as an antioxidant in vivo in these organs. In addition to reducing compounds, naringenin also scavenged Fe(3+) species, as measured in the absence of microsomes. The inhibitory effect of naringenin was observed only at a concentration greater than 50 microM, in contrast to its peroxy radical scavenging activity. Thus, naringenin had a dual effect on CL generation. These results suggest that naringenin may exhibit antioxidant activity in vivo.
