A male progeny of a chicken-red junglefowl hybrid, derived from the reciprocal crosses D(yellow) and D(1D-2B), and the backcross to the red junglefowl, D(yellow) x D(1D-2B), were found to be parthenogenetic. In F2 hybrid progeny of the cross D(1D-2B) x D(yellow) the haploidy frequency deviated significantly from 50%, indicating that under these cross conditions, brown egg production occurred in males as well as females. The allele frequency of the wild-type red junglefowl red allele (R) in the brown eggs is about 11% in the D(1D-2B) x D(yellow) hybrid males, and these brown males can be used for producing the brown eggs of the chicken-red junglefowl hybrid.
