We present the results of a search for the rare $B(0) \rightarrow J/\psi K(0)$ decay in a sample of $\approx 386 \text{ fb}^{-1}$ of $pp[\text{over } \bar{p}]$ collisions at 1.96 TeV collected with the LHCb experiment at CERN.

The results represent the first observation of this particular process and are based on a data sample collected during the 2012 LHC run. A recently developed multivariate technique is used to significantly improve the sensitivity of this decay channel. The measured branching fraction and first evidence for the relative phase between tree-level and loop-induced amplitudes are

$$B(B(0) \rightarrow J/\psi K(0)) = (2.1 \pm 0.6(\text{stat.}) \pm 0.5(\text{syst.})) \times 10^{-5}, \quad \delta = (53 \pm 10^\circ \pm 30^\circ)^\circ,$$ respectively.

Q: textblob very slow to run I am using textblob from here in my project. It works fine. But I found that it is much slower than other libraries, like NLTK, to run. I don't know why textblob runs much slower. Are there any ways to make it more efficient? My code is Python 3. Additional information: I am using Mac OS, python3.3, mac os version 10.6.8. And I have Intel Quad core i5 2.6Ghz.

A: textblob is written in C++/C with several C extensions. TextBlob performs better than NLTK because it isn't trying to be a general tool for natural language processing (the NLTK guys were trying to create a general purpose tool that could solve any problem you cared to throw at it), so it isn't

Both player's first and second person view is synced and the player is able to switch views if wanted. Players are placed into five different sectors of the map, each sector is placed further away from each other and the closer the players is to the center of the map the more difficult it will become to survive. Players spawn with a starting pre-determined amount of items such as pre-determined weapon loadouts and pre-determined Medic items to start. (Medical items available in game are Medkit and Bandage) Players are still able to crouch, lean in and move their character, however when a player gets close to or takes damage their movement speed will decrease. If the player is unable to defend themselves from incoming attacks they will take damage and lose health. When players take damage or receive a killing blow they will die and their controller or other connected device will light up, this is your game over. When a player dies they will drop all of their items and have to spawn in again. All kills award the player the player with a random amount of coins in a of the currencies in the game: Gold, Ruby and Diamond coins, and to unlock higher tier weapons and items. Depending on the number of players in the game we can scale the number of kills you can get. If a player is killed they will receive a kill message from the server and the round will end. You will be able to see if your opponents are dead/deaf, this can be used to take advantage of their death, however this cannot be confirmed and will always be a possibility. This experience is fast paced and the game will never get stale no matter the number of players, we may adjust game play to keep things fresh. We are continuously adjusting the game and we are constantly adding new features and adding players to the game to keep things fresh. We know what game modes work best for our players and we want to make sure they have a great experience. Feedback: If you have any feedback or suggestions for our game please email us at We look forward to hearing from you. The Prison Experiment: Battle Royale is a free to play battle royale experience that is free to download. Version 1.06 will be the first change to the beta. What's new in Colonize Prologue:

is a real-time robot playground for the Raspberry Pi. RoboVVino is a version which has been around a bit more in testing than the one we have here, because I'm one of the maintainers of RoboVDino. And even RoboVVino is pretty ancient, it's been around since 2014 I think or something, so they actually have a better version than the one I have up here, and that's RoboVDino. So RoboVDino is made up of two parts, RoboVDino is the main application that does a lot of things that RoboVVino is not meant to do; you could say it's a kind of game and RoboVDino is the game. So the basic game concept of RoboVDino is like Tetris. So you have a line of bricks on the screen, and on top of the bricks is a square that's meant to be like cheese in Tetris. So the goal of the game is to keep that square from touching the line of bricks on the bottom of the screen. So it's kind of like Tetris, but you've got robots instead of tanks. In the RoboVDino application it has an endless play mode where the game never ends. So my opponent is never going to beat me, I'm never going to beat him. He's always able to completely own me. This plays in a randomized way and sometimes he'll win better than me and often he wins less than I do. The winning/losing is probably the most interesting aspect of the game for me. Because if I'm playing against my current high-level peer, which I think is four or five or six years old, he always beats me. And it's a humiliating experience to lose, like you're like what is this? No I have skill. This one's a piece of shit. My time has come, you guys should train me. And in that case it can hurt my ego, it's kind of like momentum in sports where you get that competitive edge on your opponent when they're not as good as you are, right? If you start winning to the primary market of older games, free-to-play games are a whole new ball game. Free-to-play games like Candy Crush and Clash of Clans have made using in-app purchases a common practice, with many of them including more than one method of payment. But there's a new contender to this lucrative market: a free-to-play game made with a completely different approach. Free-to-play game Happy Wheels was released in 2012. This new edition is the third version and was developed by Japanese developer the Bitgravity. Happy Wheels is the game of
