In this tactical turn-based strategy game, you're on a direct mission to either survive a galactic invasion, or to eliminate your position from the universe. Of course, your mission is to eliminate the position of all enemies on the board by defeating them one-by-one, until every member of their attacking fleet has been eliminated. Each turn represents one minute of time. What's new in Diner Together:

For Sport Mismatched Success By Ann Waltersit's easier to be around people you like than the people you don't like. "I can't stand politics. I can't stand the media. I can't stand the people," Mike Young said, getting up from his desk to work a crossword puzzle with me. "So I try to practice what I preach." I noticed what he said because he doesn't say the words the way other people would. He says "can't." The "can't" is there instead of "don't." He spoke his way into a successful career, but there was a gap between his expensive suits and his living room clothes; the gap almost always showed through the upscale neighborhoods of Boston. As for media and the "people," Young tried to avoid them by moving his travel and work in the world of sports. He was never chosen as top coach in the Boston Celtics basketball program. Though he coached legends like Bill Russell and K.C. Jones, he seldom got invited to a media conference. He couldn't always escape hearing the circus of voices of basketball and politics and so he applied a filter to his voice to change his words to fit his self-image of who he wanted to be. When I met Mike Young in 2008, he had to say his name for the intercom. "Johnny," said the security guard, "there's a lady here to see you." Young didn't want to talk. I told him my name, and he nodded toward the door. I went in and Mike Young said, "Please come back." I told him I would walk back across the street, and a few minutes later, he was in his office as relaxed as ever. "Welcome to the house," he said. He shows me where everything is. He is expansive, and he talks about his work. He invites me to his house to meet some people, and then he goes to his desk to explain the politics of basketball. "When I was 14 years old, I had seven chances to play in the NBA. Seven," said Mike Young. His final words are a powerful reminder. What does a coach do with the lottery pick of a 7th-year high school student? The second draft pick
