Basically I want the client to add a few different pieces of data to the front-end (keywords, descriptions, etc) and then for each of these pieces of data, I want to tie it to a 'resource' or 'products' row so the client can easily edit it. What I've been using so far is a 'products' taxonomy term, and since the same field (product_description) is used in both terms (because they're tied to a single product), I've figured I can just use hook_form_alter and add some hidden fields to the form that looks for the term id of the taxonomy term. Is there a better way to do this? A: That's the right idea, but it can be made more efficient. You can use a wrapper round your product info, then just save the wrapper by its id. So with a view as follows (just creates an entry for each product): Add a taxonomy term (my_product_type) Create a display on the term display: add a Views output. Add the term (so each row will have a my_product_type set). Create a view to get information for each of these rows (this will give you the product title and description) Add a filter to exclude the record you wish to edit, and select the my_product_type for the filter. Having this setup, you can just save a new wrapper (eg. {$wrapper->title}), and it will pick up all the products you have. I could always tell when the No. 2 overall pick in the 2005 NBA Draft would have a strong game. Like the majority of NBA rookies, he started out a d0c515b9f4
