Lunar New Year (Chinese: 春节, Pinyin: Yúnnán Luóh Chūn) is the traditional Chinese New Year Festival that generally falls on the Chinese Lunar Calendar.[1] It is celebrated in mainland China, Hong Kong, Macau, Taiwan, and other Chinese communities. It is the second largest religious festival in mainland China and is the most important festival in East Asia. It is also seen as a traditional time for Chinese to meet their family and friends, attend parties and leisure events, and celebrate the Chinese Spring Festival. For years, the festival has been a multi-day period of religious activities, celebrations, food and entertainment. On the eve of the Chinese New Year, the Chinese people visit their family members and pray for good luck. According to the ancient Chinese philosophy, the Sun and the Moon, as the two most important elements of the Universe, have a unique relationship with the Earth and the signs of the zodiacs. They are believed to be born at that time, and their waxing and waning cycle follows lunar calendar every year. In other words, the Chinese believe that the Sun, Moon and zodiac signs have been together since the beginning of the Universe. In fact, the Chinese word "lunar" means "dark and mysterious", and "new year" means "clearing the dark". Therefore, the Chinese New Year is known as the New Moon Festival (and the Moon Festival) in China because it celebrates the New Moon that brings sunlight, warmth and hope to the world. The date for Chinese New Year has been calculated according to the Chinese lunar calendar since the ancient times. The Chinese New Year festival is a 10-day festival with three periods: one is seven days before the New Year, the other is from January 21 to January 28, and the last period is from January 30 to February 4. The Chinese New Year is not only for luck but also for gratitude. On the eve of the New Year, people would visit their family and ask the ancestors for blessings. In some areas of Chinese countryside, people would go to local temples for keeping Goddess of Fortune Daogan Pavilion. Chinese believe that fortune comes along the path and is willing to bless them. When people visit the temple, they would pray the Goddess of Fortune with traditional songs and dances to ask for her blessings. On January 5, the Goddess of Fortune 6d1f23a050
