I would like to thank Flame Painter for its good product. The authors identified eight variables that were closely linked to safe and clean working conditions. They classified the variables by level of importance and, within each level, they organized them by conceptual and empirical criteria for organizational safety. On that basis they created a conceptual framework based on theory and previous research. The framework was then used to sort and arrange the variables. When the authors examined categories of study, they categorized them according to a set of metrics that include cost, benefit, and risk. Analyses identified 8 categories that effectively discriminate between the variables that were important to safety. Within each of these 8 categories, 2-4 variables represent the risk component and 2-4 variables represent the benefit. The authors identified six categories of study, including organization, work system, worker, equipment, facility, and environment. Within each of these categories, the authors identified 6-10 variables that represented the risk component and 6-10 variables that represented the benefit. The authors identified seven distinct themes: safety climate and culture, reliability, skills, safe and healthy, management commitment, physical layout, and surveillance. Within each theme, the authors identified 6-10 variables that represented the risk component and 6-10 variables that represented the benefit. They found a highly consistent pattern within each of the categories and themes of safety-promoting variables identified in their study. Moreover, the authors found that the categories and themes were largely mutually reinforcing and that the variables were linked to the theme in a way that they related to safety. The authors identified five aspects that they considered to be the most important to safety at work: safety climate, safety culture, management commitment, environment, and organization. The authors discuss the findings and make a number of suggestions for
