In Chernobyl, somebody answered by not touching the reactor site. There is general agreement that we need to do nothing other than move people away from the site. However, this doesn't really address what risks there would be with working on the reactor. Reactor design has changed in many ways over the years and if we have something similar at some point in the future, obviously we won't know what kind of thing we should be keeping away from the site. A: The prevailing attitude should be that nuclear reactors should be left alone for multiple reasons. (1) There is a possibility that a meltdown/crater/whatever could happen. (2) There is a possibility that the containment has leaked. Once it is found that this has happened, there is no reason to try and patch it up. Anything that lets out air, opens a leak path, or gives the containment an unnecessary load, is worse than nothing, and there are many designs to inspect for these things. (3) There is the possibility of a sabotage. It is even possible that a radiation release could do something. For example, it could be used to deliberately induce cancer in workers. Nuclear reactors are designed to operate for 50 years or so, and since they are not reversible, you can put them in a truck and 6d1f23a050
