A: First thing I would do is to set the value of the Description attribute of the.docx file to the same value you give in the DescriptionName property of the OpenXmlReader, and save the document again. You can do this after you have set its ContentType. If you do this, you will be able to open this document without any exceptions. In order to get the version from a Word document you can use the Open XML SDK 2.0. That way you can use standard Open XML Transformations, so you won't need any Microsoft Office tool like Word itself. A: My best guess is that: [EmbeddedImage(IrrelevantAttribute = "")] does two things: Uses the description. Sets the embedded image link to the same description. If this is the case, then you'd need to break out of the loop once you've gotten rid of the embedded image -- no need to keep going. Otherwise, you'd keep seeing the embedded image. (You said the document is in English, so I'm assuming the description is there for some reason, e.g. copyright notices. If so, that would explain it.) One thing to try is to set the description to an empty string. You might then get a document with an embedded image that only loads if the description is not empty, and still open up. You could also temporarily disable the embedded image. Q 6d1f23a050
