A mast cell-derived factor, different from the interleukin-6, can be isolated from human fetal lungs and may play a role in the pathogenesis of some inflammatory lung disorders. This paper gives further results on human fetal lungs in vitro. Release of the factor is maximal when the cells are cultured in the presence of CD3-stimulating beads and culture supernatants contain about 11,000 molecules of the Mast Cell Derived Factor (MCDF). The cells have a density of about  $7 \times 10^6$ /ml. Peripheral blood monocytes also release a factor similar to MCDF after stimulation by CD3-stimulating beads. Peripheral blood monocytes release the factor from CD3-stimulating beads at a density of about  $9 \times 10^6$ /ml and have a density of about  $4 \times 10^6$ /ml.

---

Monocytes isolated from a patient with chronic eosinophilic pneumonia and circulating cells and monocytes from a patient with anaphylaxis-like symptoms release greater amounts of the factor. Histamine, which is thought to be released in the lung with the formation of histamine-containing mast cell granules in the immediate-type allergic reaction, does not release the factor. In three of four batches of fetal lung cells the mast cells have a density of about  $1 \times 10^6$ /ml, whereas in two batches of normal human peripheral blood mononuclear cells the mast cells have a density of about  $9 \times 10^6$ /ml.

Q: Should I use a PHP MySQL Query cache system? I am wondering whether I should use a query cache system like memcache or APC for caching my php mysql queries. The situation is like this, I have a PHP script that requires about 10 seconds of time to run per user request. In the case that the user does not have a direct access to that page, it will run the script 10 times (means 10 6d1f23a050
