The quiet pull-out of the British forces in Afghanistan has been overshadowed by a major scandal involving weapons allegedly supplied from our dealers in the Middle East: weapons made in Israel, allegedly for the Afghan government, but sold by UK arms dealers to intermediaries and then on to the Taliban. If the Pentagon inspector general - whose report is due by the end of April - repeats the latest details, this is one of the biggest scandals in the history of the British arms trade - bigger than the Czech arms export to Saddam Hussein's Iraq that led to the Iraq inquiry or the Iraq war itself. It has put British politicians in a dilemma. As the government prepares to hand over power to Tony Blair, the future for junior ministers, junior military officers and junior prosecutors is uncertain. But even senior ministers have gone silent. The Foreign Office and the Ministry of Defence have been warned not to get involved, and there has been little reaction at home. The substance is ghastly. British arms were allegedly sold to the Afghan government and the Taliban - who promised to use them to hunt down al-Qaida - before, following the end of the counterinsurgency war, the Afghan government discovered the weapons were defunct. The scheme was uncovered after a US undercover agent attempted to sell surplus British weapons on the black market. The agent, posing as a corrupt Afghan official, supplied £1.9m worth of weapons through intermediaries. These included thousands of AK-47s, hand grenades and ammunition, as well as a very large quantity of laser-guided mortar bombs. It is not known what the dodgy officials who allegedly came up with the scheme knew at the time. But it is likely to have been, as in the notorious case of Marc Dutroux, that the scheme was approved by the chief of the British defence intelligence agency, MI6, and other officials in Whitehall. The case was passed on to the Department of Trade and Industry (DTI), who allowed the operation to go ahead. In February 2002, two weeks before the British army handed over combat
