It was working fine earlier, and stopped working when a recent update to Mac OS X broke Python's compatibility with Mac OS X. In order to get it working again, I built a new application with an empty app-specific python.framework. Thus, I can run the old application through `sudo python -c "from oldapp import *"` from the terminal. This works fine (it's a very simplified oldapp class) but makes the new application very slow to respond. The problem has to do with the path to the system python; I'd like to use "python" but it needs to be whatever python is used to build the new application (i.e. if the new application's "python" is different from the system one it will also be different from the one running the oldapp). I've looked through Mac OS X's system-wide python and their paths are the same as the python version that the new application is using to build itself. I'm running Python 2.4.6 on Snow Leopard, if that's relevant. A: This has nothing to do with Mac OS X specifically. It's a common problem related to the name space of Python applications. If you create a new Python application it defaults to a "New and Improved" name space, which in turn breaks some other tools. You can change this, but it's a pain. What you need to do is run this code before any new applications are created: `import sys sys.path.insert(0, ".")` Then you should be able to import any module in your application's namespace. Q: Are there any good, clean, and security-aware alternatives to Wake on LAN? So far, I haven't found a software that can do what Wake 6d1f23a050
