For example, an air recirculation device is disposed within an air duct of the vehicle. The air recirculation device includes a first wall that is fixedly disposed to a second wall, where a surface of the second wall faces an occupant. Accordingly, the air recirculation device improves air recirculation within the occupant compartment of the vehicle. The air recirculation device described above, however, cannot accommodate changes in vehicle configuration. For example, in configurations where the occupant compartment is sized to accommodate one, two, or three occupants, the air recirculation device may be used effectively. However, in configurations where the occupant compartment is sized to accommodate only one occupant, the air recirculation device would work more effectively if a second wall were added to the air recirculation device. Accordingly, a need exists for an air recirculation device that can accommodate changes in vehicle configuration.
