The latest food media darling is the "Blood Caviar," a "gourmetized" version of the humble brown trout egg yolk. It's a faux-fishy, miniature soccer ball, tastes a little like tuna (gooey sweet, but not chewy or fishy), and is outrageously overpriced ($65 per doble on Etsy) — but makes all the cool, decadent "sushi" shops worth a visit. Now, there's a new kid on the block in the world of sushi; a student-run, economic-scale, for-profit sushi chain launching soon in Brooklyn, which I stopped by to check out on a recent visit. When Tuna Caviar was founded by Teodora Malyuta and Erika Twardak in 2016, they were two, self-described "foodies" seeking to make it big in the world of sushi and Japan food (along with their partner, chef Yoshi Fujimoto, formerly of 'Fukubos,' an impossibly charming Brooklyn restaurant). They partnered with Congee Village, a classic, casual Malaysian Chinese restaurant in the heart of downtown, Brooklyn, where Tuna Caviar would set up a small food stall inside. (Note: the restaurant's location is currently undisclosed. The partners said it'll be a surprise to find out where the restaurant is located, just before the grand opening, on May 19. Their website also notes that they won't be revealing the restaurant's location until the restaurant's opening.) Tuna Caviar's first stall was quickly set up, and the restaurant caught the attention of a lot of hungry, local visitors. "We were just literally running out of our kitchen.
