When i create a new document from code, using the model ids are lost. When they are restored from disk, the model id property is set to 0 in each instance of the tree. I've tried adding a RESTORE_CUSTOM_PROPERTIES_CACHE property to the ModelReplicationSession class, but this has no effect on the problem. It seems the custom properties are stored in the TreeModel but if they are reset to zero then they are reset in each node and each leaf within that node, so there is no way to associate them with the specific content if they are set to a default of 0. Re: Custom properties on a tree model Thanks. No, i'm not aware of it, the custom properties should be preserved in the database, so i just thought there may be something missing or overridden in my code. Do you know if it's possible to export the custom properties from a model instance? Re: Custom properties on a tree model I use TreeModel.SaveCustomProperties() in a restore-cycle (which happens before the CustomProperties are reverted): Is CustomProperties.Entries is a list of all your custom properties? If so, I'd take a look at your serialization. Do you use any custom properties that are only set on insertion/selection? That might be the reason you see 0 values. I'm in the situation where some custom properties have a default value and that value is 0. I set them to a non-zero value on insertion or selection and restore them on restore. Re: Custom properties on a tree model We are using the SQLPersistenceManager but the problem seems to happen on a generic thread, so there are no instances of the ModelReplicationSession class that are instanced in a particular location or thread. The custom properties are generated from an ObjectPersister in a ModelReplicationSession class and are persisted using the SQLPersistenceManager.
