feminist theorists have therefore understood gender as a multilayered concept, which is not a fixed and naturalised category. rather, it is a mode of social being that is shaped by the power relations that surround it. this does not mean that gender is not a fixed or naturalised category, but rather that gender is a socially constructed category and is shaped by specific power relations and institutional arrangements. feminist theory therefore rejects the notion of gender-neutrality as a universal theory that is, a theory that assumes gender as a fixed and naturalised category. instead, feminist theorists have challenged this concept of gender-neutrality as a gendered and discursive one. theorists of ir

have been centrally concerned with the building and maintenance of states, which is seen as a central mechanism for the building of peace and peace maintenance. feminist theory has thus helped to deconstruct this idea that international relations is neutral. feminist theory has therefore challenged the assumption of a gender-neutral IR and has instead focused on gender and its role in the making of peace. In recent decades, scholars in the fields of international relations, international law and international political theory have increasingly turned to feminist theory in order to better understand and analyse gendered patterns of international politics. Many of the dominant modes of thinking about international politics refer to the United States as the centre of the system. The power of the United States, its role as the primary world power, the freedoms and liberties enjoyed by American citizens, the American way of life, and so on, have all become closely tied to notions of the United States as the central state in the international order.
