The study is open-label. Each patient was randomized to one of the two arms and only data from patients in the first bevacizumab-adcd arm could be used. It is unfortunate that they are using the small subgroup as the endpoint for this approval. Such an endpoint artificially inflates the value of the study. To make it worse, they are not reporting the data this way for the whole trial. Results showed that as a first-line treatment, bevacizumab-adcd highly similar to the reference product in terms of efficacy, safety, and pharmacokinetics. It is not possible to know whether bevacizumab-adcd is priced lower for the same quality, quantity, and delivery of drug product than bevacizumab (Avastin), said an FDA spokesperson. Drugs priced below bevacizumab-adcd should still demonstrate clinically equivalent safety and efficacy. Patients and health care providers should know the source and content of the product and not rely on the "label copy" on the packaging to determine if the product is similar to bevacizumab (Avastin).
