The present study was to examine the attitudes of college students towards aggressive video game play. In Study 1, the authors asked students (N = 203) to describe the genre of video games in which they play the most, their average game play time, how often they play video games, their attitudes towards violent video games, and the extent to which they would play video games that teach them how to fight or kill in virtual reality (VR). The results showed that the students played in a variety of video game genres, that they played video games an average of 3-4 hours per day, and that their attitudes towards violent video games were predominantly negative. In Study 2, the authors tested whether the students would adjust their attitudes towards aggressive video game play in the face of some information regarding the undesirable effects of such play, specifically the harm to the player or those around him/her. The results of this study showed that in general, participants' attitudes towards aggressive video game play did not change when they learned that the impact of their play was on themselves or on others. However, the results indicated that participants more likely to develop negative attitudes towards such play would be people who were more effective players. In Study 3, the authors asked students to describe the worst video game they have ever played and the worst video game they played in the past week. In addition to describing the worst game they have ever played, participants were also asked to rate how they felt when they played it, what they learned from the game, how much they enjoyed playing the game, and how much they learned after playing it. The results indicated that the worst game that most participants had ever played was Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas. Findings of the study also indicated that they used humor in an attempt to cope with the negative experiences of playing the game. In Study 4, the authors examined the impact of playing Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas on the participants. The results showed that students who had played this game in the past week had experienced more aggressive thoughts, feelings, and behaviors than students who had not played this game. In addition, the researchers found that students who played this game had learned to be more focused and had controlled their anger. Finally, the researchers found that the more students played Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas, the more positive their attitudes towards aggressive video game play were.
