in windows vista, the system tray, notification area, and the taskbar where the user could launch applications were all integrated into a single bar. the taskbar, consisting of a set of buttons, can be moved, resized, and can be made transparent. applications can be pinned to the taskbar, which displays the name of the app at the end of a button, and the app can be temporarily hidden by dragging its taskbar button down. the user can also hide the icon of the application in the system tray, by right-clicking on its icon in the tray, and drag and drop it to the taskbar. these features can be accessed through a contextual menu. the home screen in windows 7 is called the live tile and has replaced the xp-style start menu. it is a fullscreen application for application-specific content, such as weather and news updates and alerts from microsoft, that is intended to make windows 7 interactive and dynamic. it can be used to access a number of features such as the start screen, the app list, app search, and program shortcuts. it also includes a weather app that allows you to download and view satellite and tire weather information via the live tile, but it does not support offline viewing. the live tiles can be updated via the internet or, for offline tiles, using a version of windows update that stores data for live tiles on the local computer. a compatibility mode, windows 7 mode, is available to allow users running windows vista or windows xp with the sp1 update to fully function with the newly released operating system. the windows 7 mode also offers users the option of installing a custom start menu that resembles that of windows vista, but is not included by default. the search has been enhanced to allow the user to search apps, files, and settings.
