Impermeability of human intestinal mucosa to acetazolamide and disposition in human jejunum. The absorption rate and the concentration of acetazolamide in the jejunal fluid and tissues were determined in 10 healthy subjects after 20 mg oral dose. The drug is poorly absorbed, the area under the curve remaining below that of a marker substance until 2 h. The absorption rate is fast during the first 30 min; it is the same in the jejunum, transversum and rectum. The compound is rapidly absorbed and concentrations in the jejunal and ileal fluids are about 1.6 times higher than those in the peripheral blood. No detectable acetazolamide concentrations were found in the ileum and colon. The transit time of the drug through the different sections of the intestine is about 3 h. The pharmacokinetics and the tissue distribution of acetazolamide do not require the presence of a drug metabolizing enzyme. It is suggested that acetazolamide is absorbed in the gut by a carrier-mediated transport mechanism in the enterocytes. Its absorption is limited to the jejunum and ileum. This invention relates to fastener driving tools having an impact or combustion energy driver and a power cable extending from the energy source to the driver. More particularly, the invention relates to fastener driving
