REUTERS/Kim Hong-Ji/File Photo SEOUL (Reuters) - South Korean railway operator Korail has introduced free Wi-Fi service on its metro subway lines, which will be free of charge from Friday, the company said on Wednesday. Korail will start its Wi-Fi service on the Seoul Subway Line 1 in South Korea's capital Seoul from Friday. "This Wi-Fi service will be available for free during the operating hours of the subway lines," Korail said in a statement. Korail also expects to introduce the free Wi-Fi service on the Seoul Metro Line 2 and the Seoul Metro Line 6 in the next six months. Wireless internet access has been slowly creeping into South Korea. About 11 percent of the country's population already accesses internet through Wi-Fi hotspots. In South Korea, internet service is provided for free by telecom carriers, as the cost is absorbed by the companies. On Wednesday, South Korean carrier KT Corporation, which operates KT Corp in telecoms services, announced it will provide free Wi-Fi access for 30 days in its stores nationwide. South Korean cable company Daum Communications Corp is also working on its free Wi-Fi service to be deployed by mid-2017. (This story corrects typo in paragraph 4 and adds deadline for free Wi-Fi service)I had a similar problem with a dual core machine and was able to solve it by running firefox in the following way. sudo apt-get install libappindicator1 (or
