Meer info Wat is E-mail validation? The risk of using e-mail validation is twofold. First, email address spoofing is becoming a common problem for online banking, and using a validation of addresses helps prevent the risk of losing money. Second, it's just good etiquette to use something other than your work or home address when sending spam, and this also helps prevent people from sending you spam messages. What is blind validation? Blind validation is when an email address is validated without being verified, because the ISP uses a validation mechanism to prevent address spoofing. It is considered safe to use a validated address in a spam filter, but it's not very effective in preventing spammers from sending you spam, because most spammers don't use this validation process. You may be automatically sent to a validation service when you send a spam email, and your message will be rejected if it's not verified. What is email verification? Verifying your email address means that the email provider contacts the email address and either confirms that it is valid, or not. This is often done automatically by the provider, or you can have an email sent to the address asking you to verify it. Can I use my ISP's email verification for my email address? Yes. You can use the email verification your ISP provides, or you can use a different method. It's very easy to verify email addresses. Go to "Settings" and click on the "Options" tab. Click on "Email Account" to add a new account. Click on "Validate" to verify the email address. When you complete the account, the verification email will be sent to your email address, and you can use the address in any part of the world. Why don't I see my email address in my email account? The email address you see on your email account isn't your true email address. The email address you see on your email account is an alias that isn't visible to others, and it can be used by other members of your ISP to send email to you.
