The Lightroom 5 "Custom Libraries" dialog is simple and easy to use. It includes a selection between two choices. The first is a setting in which the application will work with the specified file types. It's the same as the "Custom Settings" option we saw in older versions. The other choice is to add any other file type. These are relative ("libraries" are different than folders) "plug-ins" that allow any other file types to be related to Lightroom. There are some downsides and, to be fair, nowhere are the caveats that come with plug-ins such as the Ctrl+Click confusion in Export. One nifty feature in this version is the ability to add Library Items (Technically, "Actions" but I'll call them Items) to the Libraries. These are little additions to the default effect of a "Library". The list is endless, but it will show any effect that can be added as such within Photoshop (or any other program). For instance, if you add a Lens Correction or Curves Action to a Library, you can apply these to any selected image (now you wouldn't even have to specify the Library in the "Libraries" dialogue). Other useful effects include the Lens Correction Stabilizer, Device Blur, and Film Grain. When comparing Lightroom 5 to previous versions, I believe the 'Automatic' improvements make Lightroom 5 nearly as good as, or better than, 4.6 in most cases, however some improvements in Library Management and Edit Custom Settings cannot be overlooked. It becomes a bit harder to convince the average person to upgrade from version 4, due to the lack of a "Custom Libraries" option. It's still not perfect, but getting better all the time.

Next, you can select the Filter Style (either Grainy or Oil), and set the Amount of Filter to apply as a ratio to the amount in the original image. The image will automatically grow with more Filter applied. For example, if you choose Grainy 17%, this filter will use an equal amount of Photoshop's vignetting Filter to grow the image naturally, like a 17% filter would. If you choose Oil 82%, this filter will shrink the image to 82% of its size as it applies the Filter. An additional slider lets you adjust contrast or saturation.
