Within plant communities, leaves of species with similar life history traits are often associated. Because species with similarly shaped leaves are under selection to have competitively equivalent leaf economics, leaf shape and chemical defenses may be subject to strong convergence. We test for convergence in leaf shape and chemical defenses in the laurel lineages of North American tree species. Leaf shape is correlated with leaf chemistry, and shape has been shown to be associated with herbivory. We tested for convergence on leaf chemistry and shape by comparing the relationships between foliar damage and lignin (McKenna-Carr and specific lignin subunit content) in comparative analyses of 15 North American laurel lineages. We examined strength and direction of association of two fitness-related leaf traits with herbivory over ten trophic levels in natural plant communities in temperate northern temperate, boreal, and evergreen forests in the western United States. Our data suggest positive convergence in lignin and foliar damage and provide further support for convergent selection on lignin chemistry during the invasion of tree species into montane forests.

Q: What is the difference between `{0}` and `{0,number}` in JavaScript For example when I tried: `var x = '0'` `var y = '0'` `var z = '0,number'` What is the difference between the variable `x,y,z`? A: All of them are strings. The first, `'0'`, is a string with single character (actually, a single byte) with hex value `0x30`, the other are strings with variable length strings of hex values `0x30`, `0x31` and `0x32`. If you look up hex values in the JS documentation, you will
