There are some advantages to putting those things in front of you. You can shoot your scene in a way that gives you a lot of flexibility if you don't actually like the image you took. And the other advantage -- and probably the biggest -- is that if you don't like the way it looks, you don't need to spend time going back and changing things. You can just change the settings and go to the next thing. To achieve that flexibility, we wanted to change our on-screen approach to scaling your images. We're no longer going to show you the exact exposure settings, but more than that, we're showing you the scene you're shooting in. The scene comes alive on the screen and that allows you to quickly make decisions about composition, lighting, and focus. The design is the big early win for Photoshop Camera, but there's a lot more to it. The camera's viewfinder showcases three panes that give context to what's on the scene. The left panel shows your phone's live view, the middle panel shows the scene you're shooting in, and the right panel shows what happens as you flip between the three panes. The lower part of the screen is reserved for your on-screen controls, where changing exposure settings is just a click away. A double tap on the screen will call up your on-screen tools, and a single tap will handle quick edits. You can use the built-in tools, or if you prefer, you can take advantage of the fill and filters tools, gradients, and layers that you get from Photoshop. 933d7f57e6
