We present a comparative study of the effect of the non-bonded interactions on the stability of the low energy conformations of rigid and semiflexible proteins. Using the algorithms of Lazaridis and Skolnick (L-S), we show that the stable, low energy conformations of a rigid protein may have more than one distinct value of the radius of gyration as well as various values of the normal to local plane angle and/or the local dihedral angle. We perform an extensive thermodynamical analysis of the proteins-antiparallel beta-sheets, beta-barrels and knotted proteins-selected so that their average value of the radius of gyration is less than or equal to the value for a generic protein of the same length. Our calculations show that when the entropy of local area increase is adequately calculated (following the L-S algorithm), the normalized Gibbs free energy of the stable conformations of the given protein is very close to the value of the latter, calculated for a generic protein of the same length. This further shows that the thermodynamical stability of the stable conformation of a protein depends very little upon a detailed knowledge of the local interactions.india Updated: Mar 25, 2019 13:55 IST A second woman accused of perpetrating violence against the family of Dalit scholar Rohith Vemula in 2016 was on Monday reported to the police by a leading journalist in Hyderabad.
