The first advantage is that it can be much faster than using those filters and adjustments in Photoshop, because the process begins much faster, and can be much faster for better results. When we were using raw files, we had to convert them into a lossy format which sometimes caused the loss of data, making it unusable. Today, the files coming out of my camera are in the lossless format, without losing any of their data, but I also have the option to convert them in the JPEG format. And this allows me to do some adjustments before saving them.
