With 16 million elements in Photoshop, the majority of them not accessible until you click and drag or type out a command than open up the Element Palette, it's no wonder it took Adobe this long to create a simple-to-use and effective Search and Replace. The Replace tab by default shows you all layers, and using the Select layer button makes it simple to compile all layers into an Actions set. Add your own custom searches for complex layers that aren't available via existing commands. The Layer palette from this tab is one of Project Generator's earliest adopters: "What's all this stuff about?" Photoshop asks when you select the Layer palette. Additionally, Adobe has built in new options and features to help you prepare and process images, including a Style Panel in the Edit>Fill & Stroke menu, Options>Enhance>Exposure>Adjustment, and Options>Enhance>Filters>Adjustment.

Because of its existing cross-platform capabilities, Photoshop Elements has been a great choice for photographers looking to get their work done on a variety of devices, without having to pay for separate versions. For years we've been able to edit, crop, remove, or change the look of those photos on the go, whether it's on your iPad, Android tablet, Windows laptop, or desktop computer, with the same experience. An article in The Los Angeles Times noted that Adobe's Chet Haase, Senior Product Manager for the Digital Imaging Business, noted that Photoshop on the web was initially a "proof of concept" much like a website is, he said. It's also an important part of the business, he said. He began his career at Adobe as a Macintosh computer programmer and later worked on Photoshop and other key applications at the company, such as Bridge and Photography. While the company is massive and owns a multi-billion dollar business, it gets more customer-focused every day as it pushes to renew itself and expand its offerings. Photoshop for the web seems like the last nail in the coffin for one of the giants in the imaging world. The new web software comes with several missing features, but Adobe says some of these features will come in the future. GCDailies Editor in Chief Bob Sorcar, Senior Architect at Adobe, said the company wants to "get there, touch base, get a sense of what's next for web. We don't have all of the features today, but we have an understanding of what we want to do. Here's the new vision of what we want to do, and here's what we're doing.
