Lightroom 5 now allows you to import both 16-bit and 32-bit images while maintaining their original color depth. It includes full 64-bit support, too. It has a color management system that lets you set the camera's icc profile, along with the white balancing feature that adjusts the lighting in an image. This software allows you to brand your documents, and also makes it easier to view your branding on the documents you create.

This new feature makes it easier for you to change the branding too, by giving you different scaling options on the canvas, and to see how the branding is going to look on the documents at a larger scale. With the new gradient and fill feature, you can create artistic graphics, which adds a nifty layer of sophistication to your graphics, without having to go into a separate application to produce them. For example, you can add stripes and different patterns to the fill, which adds an element of visual interest.

If you're a renovator, you can use the camera-like Active Layer feature to select parts of the image, and then create a unique blend of gradients on the selected parts. This adds several life-like visual elements to your projects. In addition, the update makes it easier to create layers from a scanned image. If you print something often, preserving those previews helps keep them concise, so you can look back through the whole series of prints, and easily make the final decisions for the landscape or multiple prints in a single preview.
