The first way to cope with the problem is to be prepared to lose data. The second way is to have a backup plan in place. Once you have a strategy for data loss, the task of recovering the data falls into the realm of time management. If you are using R's environment for statistical computing, data can be lost in the same way that a program can be lost. This blog post is going to focus on the more common case of a "data loss" event, rather than a system-wide failure. Data loss events are typically caused by problems in the part of your systems that writes out data to disk. It's possible that you will have an intermittent problem, so that you find that most of the files are corrupted, but that a few still work fine. To tell the difference between the files that you can and can't read, you should probably do an initial scan of the dataset to identify a set of files that are "good". In this case, we are going to work with the Hmisc package. Our dataset was created using the tidy evaluation function, and is stored in a file called test_results.rda. The total number of variables is 942, and the size of the dataset is about 5400 MB. # Explore the data frame to see the number of variables test_results <- tidy_eval::tidy(test_results) head(test_results)
